P R E F A C E.

THE present English-Latin part of our Dictionary is in some respects constructed on a different plan from that adopted in the Latin-English part. The prosody is not marked, except in a few cases, where it is necessary to indicate the conjugation to which a verb belongs; nor is information given as to the gender and declension of nouns and the conjugation of verbs—the compiler having, according to the usual practice, confined himself to giving simply the Latin equivalents to the English words and expressions. By this means considerable space has been saved, and the student is not subjected to much inconvenience, for as soon as he has found the word or phrase required, he can turn to the first part of the Dictionary, where he will find the necessary information upon all the points above mentioned. For etymological information, the student is likewise referred to the Latin-English part.

It is perhaps scarcely necessary to observe, that in an English-Latin Dictionary there necessarily occur a great many words for which there are no equivalents in classical Latinity. In these cases such words and forms are given as have been commonly employed by modern Latinists, and they are distinguished from the genuine classical words by having a † prefixed to them.
